TWO DROMIOS IN REAL LIFE.

This Time They Are Women and Are Afraid to Meet.

There are two Chicago women who are anxious to meet and yet afraid of each other. They have never seen each other, even at a distance, and would probably go blocks out of their way to dodge each other. The reason of all this is their remarkable resemblance. Each is stopped on the street by people who take her for the other. The clerks in the big dry-goods stores get mixed over them. They have several friends in common, who are always making mistakes and telling about them. One lives on the South Side and one on the West, and they move in entirely different "sets"; this accounts for the fact that they have never met.

Now both these women are handsome and stylish, and well groomed. In this fact lies the reason of their being afraid to meet. Each fears to find the other better looking or better dressed or more attractive. It really has come to such a pass that neither ventures to go shopping without making a swell toilet. What was at first considered a good joke has come to be a serious matter, and has set the nerves of both women awry.

The common friends are now scheming to bring them together. They argue that two women so much alike should be the warmest sort of friends. But it does not take much of a student of human nature to predict that they are wrong.—Chicago Inter Ocean.
